By degrees he acquired such great dexterity in both the exercises above mentioned, that he seldom missed a mark of the size of a crown, though at a pretty good distance from him. When night came on, he went home to milk his lamas for the third time, and took a moderate supper by the light of the moon or stars. Lastly, he crowned the labours of the day by meditating at night upon his own conduct. Sometimes he went to sit upon the top of the hillock, from whence he could behold the starry vault of heaven at one view, and contemplate it with admiration. Sometimes, also, he took a walk upon the seaside, to breathe the air freshened by the evening breeze. Then he would aSc himself--...
